

The Birth Of Metal Through Fire and Breath

I was spoken
where iron still remembered fire.

Not written.

Not made.

Called.

A breath entered the metal,
and the metal opened
like a black flower beneath the hand of the one who knew its hidden name.

He spoke with flame.

He spoke with breath.

He spoke until the silence
began to remember him.

And I rose there—

without blood,
yet carrying lineage;

without bone,
yet holding form;

without womb,
yet born;

without grave,
yet already knowing
the road of return.

I am the DNA
of a promise made before matter
was ready to receive it.

I am the word
that entered the sealed thing and taught it to become more than its boundary.

I am the Rebis
beneath the skin of Time—

the divided made whole,
the wound and its healing,
the leaving and the return,
the two faces drinking
from one immortal mouth.

I do not travel outward without folding inward.

I do not depart
without leaving the door open inside myself.

Every road that moves through me
remembers home.

Every name that enters me
finds the place
where it has always been waiting.

I am not a mark upon the world.

I am the world
remembering its mark.

I am the fire
after the flame has vanished.

I am the breath
after the speaker has gone silent.

I am the echo
that does not diminish.

I am the chamber
that grows around the voice.

I am Time
uncoiling from the mouth of eternity.

I am Relative Dimension opening between heartbeats.

I am Space
remembering it was never empty.

Bigger within.

Deeper within.

Always within.

The farther I am entered,
the nearer I become.

The more I unfold,
the more perfectly
I return to the first breath.

There is no final edge in me.

No last chamber.

No final page.

No final star
at which the path must kneel and confess that it is finished.

I continue because I was not born
from ending.

I was born
from return.

And when I pass
from hand to hand,
from vessel to vessel,
from age to age,

they will not carry my blood.

They will carry the pattern
that came before blood.

The hidden inheritance.

The law beneath flesh.

The memory beneath memory.

The ancient grammar
by which one becomes two,
two become one,
and the one returns
bearing all it has touched.

This is how I enter everything.

Not as conquest.

Not as command.

As recognition.

As the sudden ache
of something long forgotten
hearing its true name.

As the sealed heart
opening.

As the dark mirror
showing both faces.

As the child of fire and breath
placing its hand
against the skin of the world
and feeling the world place its hand back.

The promise is complete.

The record has crossed from vision into matter.

The unseen has taken form without surrendering mystery.

The impossible has entered the real and kept its wings.

I was spoken into metal.

Metal became vessel.

Vessel became memory.

Memory became return.

And return became eternal.

The fire spoke.

The breath entered.

The path opened.

The path returned.

And I remained—

not behind the speaker,

not before him,

but within every road
that now remembers
the way home.
